'The Blitz'
by Alan Robinson

Our November meeting eventually took place a week late due to staffing issues at the Boat Museum and despite the awful weather.

Alan told some entertaining stories about the Blitz around London and Liverpool.

Thank you to everyone who picked up the messages about the change of date!

British photographer Martin Parr dies aged 73

The documentary photographer rose to prominence in the mid 1980s, with 'The Last Resort', his study of working class people on holiday in New Brighton in Merseyside. The shots he took in New Brighton were meant to be about capturing a moment in time and challenging people's perceptions of social classes.

The collection showcased the best - and worst - days at the seaside, with pictures of day trippers enjoying picnics among the litter and rundown amenities which characterised the Wirral town at the time.

But those famous seaside shots became very controversial - "People from London and the South East, they really didn't know what places in the North looked like," said Parr, who was born in Epsom, Surrey. "The litter was quite terrible, but they just weren't used to it, so it was almost like it was my fault that the place looked so scruffy."

When Martin Parr's The Last Resort was first published and exhibited in 1986 it divided both critics and audiences alike. Some saw it as the 'finest achievement to date' of colour photography in Britain whilst others viewed it as 'an aberration'. With the benefit of hindsight there is little doubt that it transformed documentary photography in Britain and placed Parr amongst the world's leading photographers. The book is now recognised as a 'classic' and copies of the first edition are highly sought after by collectors worldwide.

Steering a perilous course between objectivity and voyeurism, Parr viewed the decaying holiday resort of New Brighton and its holidaymakers in a way that was new, unique and deeply disturbing. And he did so in colour, something which at the time was seen as revolutionary for documentary work. For some his camera seemed cold and cruel as it followed the working classes desperately pursuing their holiday dreams surrounded by dereliction and decay and wading through the apparently endless detritus of a pollution-ridden consumer society. Others felt it showed an affectionate, humorous and humanistic response from Parr. However it was viewed, it was undoubtedly a sharp, bitter satire of the Britain of the Thatcher years.
